Spotlight on CZ-E

CZ-E runs on the frequency equivalent of a Zeolite and when used in this form, targets mutated cells and impurities within the living.

What is a Zeolite frequency equivalent capable of?

First we need to know what Zeolite is. Zeolites can occur naturally and in commercially produced elements, usually found in a white powder form. Zeolites can have different molecular constructions, and are used widely across construction, cleaning, medical, and agricultural industries because of its molecular sieve qualities. This means it can absorb other elements through tiny pores in its molecular makeup to trap them.

Example: A Zeolite molecular structure showing its tiny pores to trap impurities.

A Zeolite is anionic, which means it is negatively charged, and can trap positively charged ions, like lead and mercury, within it. Impurities trapped by the molecule will then be removed from (in a medical case) inside the body, generally out of the urinary tract, helping to cleanse the body of unnecessary elements.

CZ-E, being a frequency equivalent, may do the same thing. It has the same negative charge frequency, and it enters the body through its aqua carrier and goes into the blood stream. Once in the body it attracts mutated cells (also with a negative charge) and impurities, and removes them. Healthy cells will not be affected as they have a neutral charge. Removing these cells and impurities allows the body to function at a higher capacity.
